

Act Report

Gabriela Garcia

After wrangling and cleaning the data to my liking I was curious about a few things. I wanted to know (1) which dog breed/type got the most retweets, (2) which dog breed/type got the highest ratings from the account itself, and (3) which dog “slang” word (doggo, floofer, pupper, or puppo ) was used the most by the account owner.

I found that the top 5 most retweeted dogs were Bedlington terrier, Afghan hound, Standard Poodle, French bulldog, and English Springer. Most of the top retweet findings made a lot of sense to me since they contained a lot of dog types that I would consider to be popularly owned or liked. Retrievers are common house hold dogs, and Corgis, Samoyeds, poodles, and French Bulldogs are a lot of peoples’ favorite dog aesthetically speaking. But the top 5 surprised me, as 3/5 we’re dog breeds I had never heard of.

I found that the top 5 highly rated dogs were Clumber, Bouvier des flandres, Pomeranian, Saluki, and Briard. Although I was surprised by this top 5 as well, most of the rest of the top rated breed types overlapped with the top retweeted breeds. This reveals that the account owner may have some of the same biases for certain dog types as their followers, either that, or the account owner just knows their audience really well.

(the amount of times each word was used in a tweet by @dog_rates)

I also found that the account also uses the word “pupper” the most in their tweets, with “doggo” coming in second, “puppo” in third, a combination of two or more words in fourth, and “floofer” in fifth. I found this to be surprising, I thought “doggo” would be the most used since it seems like a more general umbrella type term, as where “pupper” would most likely refer to a younger dog. But if there’s anything that I’ve learned from this account is that any good doggo can be a pupper.